

The SimCo Bulletin

"Better then a dumpster, yet worse then the official!" - The publisher

AD.

Support our proposal for a new video game industry in simco!

Upvote and comment on the reddit post below:

<https://www.reddit.com/r/SimCompanies/comments/1s87fit/>

The Best Business Simulator App by Abstergo Gilead Holdings

The game Sim Companies is a great find for anyone who's been bothered by the copious amount of "patronizingly easy" mobile slop that has been released in the past few years.

For the longest time, I've been looking for a game that could satisfy my craving for a challenge, yet something I don't need to be constantly checking on — a tycoon game of sorts. Not too long ago, I looked for these criteria on Google, and this was the first one everyone was talking about. Getting to have my own company, run many different businesses, and have access to a free market was a huge selling point, and I don't think I'll be uninstalling it anytime soon.

Getting the ball rolling is a bit difficult, but in a great way that emulates the rise of, well, owning businesses. While I waited for my products to produce, I also noticed a chat feature which allows you to be a part of a wonderful community by discussing trades, talking about life, and getting help, all from a convenient menu.

Despite how busy I am most days, I know I will certainly see myself coming back for a long time due to the vast amount of content that they have just waiting for you to get your hands on — and I'll still be able to hop back in as if I had never left. If you should have one game installed on your phone, let it be this one.

Clear Out Your Excess! By Appalachian State University

When players think about increasing their company value (CV), they often focus on expanding production, building new facilities, or increasing efficiency. While those strategies are important, there is another factor that can have a surprisingly large impact over time: consistently selling excess inventory.

One thing that can make selling feel less rewarding is that when a contract is in the outgoing phase, you don't immediately know how much profit you're actually making. The resources leave your inventory, but the final numbers are not always obvious until the contract is accepted and the transaction appears in the Cash Receipts and Disbursements log. Because of this delay, it can be easy to overlook the financial impact of your sales activity.

However, those profits add up. Every successful sale generates cash that contributes to your company's overall financial position. While a single transaction may not seem significant on its own, the cumulative effect of dozens or even hundreds of sales can make a noticeable difference in your CV over time. Every little bit helps, and small profits earned consistently often have a larger impact than players realize.

This is especially true for companies that produce more of a resource than they can use internally. Many businesses focus on ensuring they have enough inputs for future production, which is a smart strategy. But if stockpiles continue growing and a resource is regularly being produced faster than it is being consumed, those excess units represent an opportunity.

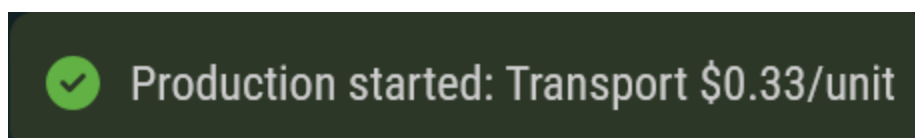

Rather than allowing surplus inventory to sit idle, selling the portion you do not need can create a steady stream of income. That extra cash can then be reinvested into expansion, used to purchase other resources, or simply strengthen your company's finances. In many cases, players may be surprised by how much value they are leaving on the table by holding onto excess inventory indefinitely.

At the end of the day, successful companies are not just good at producing resources—they are also good at turning those resources into revenue. Monitoring your production chains, identifying true surplus inventory, and consistently selling what you do not need can provide a meaningful boost to your company's long-term growth. The profits from any single sale may seem small, but over time those small gains can add up to something much larger.

New UI Changes Explained by National Reserves

Recently, our dear Patrik released a new Simcompanies UI update. These are, quite frankly, rare, considering the scale of this one. In this new update, many systems got overhauled in what seems to be an attempt to make the UX (User eXperience) much better. Here are the most noticeable of the changes.

1: The production notification. Previously, whenever you would start production, no clear UI icon would appear. Now, after setting something for production, a new popup would appear. This makes it more clear what is set for production, and is also a classic feature in most production games, meaning SimCompanies has finally reached the standard. It is also good eye candy. Ex.

2: Probably the most important one, the undercut on market feature. Before, when selling to the exchange, one had to figure out exactly how much to set prices to, but now, you can just click 1 button, and instantly undercut whatever the cheapest offer is on the market. This makes the selling process much easier and faster for all. Ex.

3. Many New Graphics! There are too many to show, but a lot of buildings were given new graphics and looks. These changes make the game not only look better but improve the overall feel of the game. During the new UI changes, the following buildings received new looks: the Castle, Catering building, the Lake, the Park, empty construction slots before having a building built into them, and lastly, a ground floor for the Exchange building.

All of these changes to buildings and icons and buttons all strive to improve the UX of SimCompanies, and personally, I think they are very successful. Hopefully, we can see more UI changes in the future with the same improving effects.

Mememe by Geoffreys Fast Food

Quotes

I took two 500mg Tylenol in a 5 hour time frame will i die? - Jaws2012

“no someone thinks I'm a sly guy with my lines but I'm a chill gal yk” - Wolf Corporation

Credits to National Reserves for editing, National Reserves, Abstergo Gilead Holdings, and Appalachian State University for articles, Geoffreys Fast Food for the meme, and Wolf Corporation and Jaws2012 for quotes. If you would like to submit an article or give a review, please DM either National Reserves, Appalachian State University (both R1), or Ludenberger LLC. (R2).